NOTE: Contemporaneous Military Unit Structure

According to the Adjutant General's Annual Report of 1876 (UA24A145), the Army comprised 25 regiments of infantry, 5 of artillery, and 10 of cavalry, with a total strength of 28,150. Infantry regiments comprised 10 companies, with actual strength of each company slightly less than 50. At that time a regiment comprised a simple battalion (see p. 27, DA Lineage Book: Infantry.) An artillery regiment comprised twelve batteries, the strength of each about 48. Average strength of a cavalry company or troop (12 troops per regiment) was 75. The 12 troops were divided into 3 squadrons or battalions (see p. 271, Cavalry Tactics, 1876, UE160.A3, and p. 38, Whitman's The Troopers, U766.W44). The dismounted cavalry company and the infantry company were each divided into two platoons. When a company was under strength, the division into platoons was omitted (see Upton's Infantry Tactics, 1876, UD160.A3, and p. 73, Cavalry Tactics). The mounted cavalry company was divided into two, three, or four platoons (see p. 202, Cavalry Tactics).
